Elephants Never Forget

Winnie was a born complainer. She had complained about everything since leaving London. The beds were too hard, the meals were poor, the days were too hot or the hotels were uncomfortable. Nothing was ever right or good enough for her.

By the time we arrived in Jaipur India, the forty-two passengers on the tour knew who complaining Winnie was. "Today we visit the Maharajah's palace overlooking the city. It's quite a climb so I have arranged for you to take the trip up and back by elephant. It will only cost a small amount."

Winnie, as usual, was not pleased. "I don't like elephants," she proclaimed loudly. "They are smelly and ugly." The lead elephant turned and looked at Winnie. It was a knowing look, almost like a grin.

"Well," said Chris our bus guide, "If you want to visit the palace you will have to walk up behind the lead elephant." So Winnie the complainer, walked up the path behind the elephant.

All of a sudden the elephant handler yelled a warning. It was too late. With a knowing look the elephant lifted its trunk and filled it with water. To Winnie's horror she was showered with water. Elephants never forget.
